ARRIVAL IN ENGLAND AND MARCHING TO PRISON. The whole of the twenty-ninth of January, we were within sight of the white chalky cliffs of England, but with so boisterous a head-wind that we made but little progress. The sight of these cliffs from our ship was cheerless in the extreme, for no portion exhibited the least indication of either fertility or life;--nothing could be discerned but the low white-covered shores of this angry and troubled ocean, whose waves, by the fierceness of the head wind that we were vainly contending against, were tossing the ship about and baffling her crew in their every exertion, in a way that showed but little chance of their accomplishing their object; for as often as we stretched towards the land after an hour s beating, so often would the wind balk all the trials made,...
