There is an inner, active, selective agency at work, but the control exercised by this agency upon the destiny of the creature is mechanical and not intentional. If there is intelligence, it is still mechanically controlled intelligence. Learning may be said to have taken place, because the variation, unlike that in original instinctive response, is not merely a mechanical choice between persistent possibilities, but is the result of a permanent suppression of one original tendency in favor of another original tendency. Thus the act is productive mechanically controlled intelligence. d. Associative adaptation. --In the types of adaptation thus far noted, no new neuron systems are formed. There is often, however, an excess neural discharge. This comes especially in times of emotional excitement. Many random movements are then made as the excess discharge forces itself through new channels. If discharge through a new...
