There are a number of systems of pruning and training the lemon tree in use in California. In a general war they consist in shortening the wood, removing the strong-growing suckers, and thinning out the top when it becomes too dense. In a young tree the main branches, four or five in number, are started about 2 feet from the ground and should not be opposite each other. In general, the pruning for the first three or four years consists in cutting out or shortening to lateral buds the central upright leaders, in order to give the tree an open, laterally upward form. The strong main laterals are also headed in to make them stocky, but the finer fruit-bearing wood is not pruned. The lower...
