Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: . to execution, Whom I believed impostor and blasphemer, And He was fainting underneath His cross, And moved but slowly, with unsteady step, Spurred, as I thought, by a most holy zeal, I smote Him with my open hand, and said, --Go faster. Instant with the stroke I felt A weariness, as of a thousand years, Which cleft my bones, my marrow melted, crushed My firm-knit muscles, cracked each separate nerve, As He looked on me, terrible as God In judgment; while, with voice unheard by others, To me as awful as that which shall yet Pronounce the final sentence, He declared My doom, --to walk the earth until that day When He as final judge shall come again. Oh, dreadful! KALIPHILUS. Through my frame great terror ran, And Hell came surging o er me; everywhere Its mounting billows boiled, while awful gulfs Lay dark and bottomless between. Poor soul! KALIPHILUS. The rude procession passed. I turned and fled, Surprised that I could flee not overwhelmed, And find what seemed the earth still under me. While thunders followed after me and cried, As if about to alight upon my shoulders, --Go faster, Jew; go faster. Hopeless Jew! KALIPHILUS. I am so weary! I have wandered nowT For what should be ten thousand centuries, And yet I count the years upon my fingers. And so to wander wearily forever! Why e en the stars, which seem eternal, fall, As fruits mature, from heaven s silver tree,...
